Mean temperature, 561. May and December. Once upon a time, a man who had well-nigh reached the limit of human life, as given in Scripture, married a young woman. This has happened so often that we should not say that it was "once" his borse with him, a nigh-spirited, dark chestnut gelding. He found upon his arrival that his ability to ride at once made him popular with everybody. He was upon a time, if it were not that this parti-cular case did only happen once. The old man married the young woman but once; and he would not have done this a second time, even if he had a million opportuni-ties. He was fond and she were felic. He time, even if he had a million opportunities. He was fond, and she was fair. His was a high official position, and hers was an humble station in the social scale. But she where the young lady rides pillion-fashion. was comely, bright, virtuous, and well-mannered. These are rare traits to offset the education, fame, and official honor which the old man brought into the partnership. That she had not demeaned herself by the education, fame, and omeral nonor which the old man brought into the partnership. That she had not demeaned herself by working for her living all sensible people truly said. And he showed good judgment in wedding the woman of his choice, without reference to the difference in their social status. He had brushed aside the flimsy barriers which a false condition of society would have placed between them. Theirs was not exactly a wooing of the King and Cophetua, for we have neither Kings nor Cophetuas in this happy land. But it was, vertisement by calling at 1606 Broad street.

He loved the domestic fireside, as old men do. He dozed over his new-paper, or slumbered noisily with his bandkerchief over his head, while she fretted and pouted, unadmired and neglected. Would she go out into the bright sunshine and open the petals of her sweet young life in the sunrays? He would rather stay indoors and mouse among musty, dusty law-books and political correspondence. Then he grew jealous, for he rightly thought that a young woman, though a wife, might readily be attracted by a young man's winsome face, when the old man's face was often clouded. It was not in buman pature for a bright and charming young woman to ex-tinguish her light and sit down in the twiof the aged. So they quarrelledside; the patient is rarely able to lie on the left violently, even—and some gossips went so far as to say that he lost his temper and blade, and it frequently extends to the top of the pinched her black and blue. She said that she had be She said that she had borne his harshness, tyranny, and unreasonable jealousy long enough. He said that she was a giddy, frivolous thing, running after of weariness and debility; he is easily startled, his wild young blades, and no fit mate for a sober and dignified middle-aged gentleman. Curiously enough, none of these reflections have dropped into the minds of seem to either before they were married. They both had thought that they would be the first old husband and young wife who should live happily together. They had left nature out of their calculations. This is an old story, as old as the time of Men bave fooled themselves in Solomon. Men have fooled themselves in this sad fashion ever since the world began. And the unsympathetic part of mankind has ever remarked of the deluded one, "It serves him right." Somehow, most people make no allowance for the delusions of age. The old man who marries a young wife honestly thinks that he will be a fond and devoted husband, and that she will be a faithful wife. They both agree that this is possible of them. And if she is dazzled by his high public and social position, she is doubly sure that her great reverence will be the guardian of their conjugal love. But even great men may he mean. A certain high and mighty American senator, now no more, was wont to show a wrinkled front when his young wife wore pink ribbons in her hair, or called him by his Christian name. So when May shivered in the arms of December, and be pinched her (as they do say) black and blue, the riches and honor which he had brought into her life were gone. What is it to the fair young wife that he husband is famous or bonored by the world if he "nags" her at home, keeps her tied to the leg of his library table, and occasionally lays his hand in violence upon her? She might have known better. He wight here are the property of the state of the sta He might have known better. society of frivolous young ladies. And yet there are old men who, failing to see that the pleasures and pursuits of the young and the old do not move in the same the old do not move in the same grooves, delude themselves with the fancy that one can take to himself as a pariner for life a young woman in whose delights he cannot have any considerable share. He has exhausted life. She has not begun to live hers. He knows that all is vanity and vexation of spirit. She has heard this, but she must prove it for herself. He is the ripe fruit that suns itself on the autumnal bough befere it drops into the hand of the harvester. She is the delicate blossom just expanding in the airs of spring. The people who say that these should be brought and kept together would violate the laws of nature, which have put May and December wider than the poles apart .- New York Times.

What a Stranger Says About the Virginta Girls.

[Washington letter in Chicago Times.] young society swell who was invited not long ago to go down and visit a family in the interior of Virginia gives a very interesting picture of the pleasant customs that are still in vogue in that State. When one gets away from the railroads and towns he finds things in about the same condition that they were about one hundred years ago. There are men in some of the back countles of Virginia who never yet heard of Jackson's death, and who would be very much startled if the news was be very much startled if the news was sprung upon them suddenly. This young society man was a great horseman. He took his horse with him, a high-spirited, dark chestnut gelding. He found upon his aralong comfortably with two children-the old man and the boy in front, and the old lady, with a boy in her lap, behind. Th's system of riding is very popular among young ladies and gentlemen in Virginia. The young Virginian mounts his horse, dashes up to the saddle-block, catches his sweetheart by the band, and she bounds, like an agile gazelle, to the blanket behind him, and then she adds interest to the occasion by winding her arms around him, and his good horse starts off at a jolly pace. Now, this young swell got along very well in his visit until one day he was at church

The first, a Pelka Scherzando, is a simpli fied arrangement of a composition of H. Sie wert, and is called "Chimes in May." Thi This is probably the most meritorious of Mr, de Nordendorf's publications, and will doubt-less meet with favorable sale, as the melody is pleasing and original. It is inscribed to Mr. Howard Marshall Smith, of Richmond. The second composition is called "Edel-
